The relationship of immunoglobulin gene rearrangement analysis in pediatric acute lymphoblastic leukemia to clinical outcome. Immunoglobulin gene rearrangement analysis using Southern blotting and polymerase chain reaction (PCR) is a powerful tool for monitoring minimal residual disease (MRD) in acute lymphoblastic leukemia (ALL) after bone marrow transplantation (BMT). We evaluated the relationship of IgH-PCR to leukemia clonality by Southern blot analysis in 104 patients with pediatric ALL treated with intensive chemotherapy before BMT and evaluated the relationship of MRD to clinical outcome after allogeneic BMT in 64 patients with ALL. Of the 104 patients evaluated with Southern blotting, 78 (75%) demonstrated clonal IgH rearrangements in diagnostic marrow samples; and in 17 of these cases, PCR analysis was also positive for clonality. In a series of 64 children with ALL, a prospective study to assess the relationship of MRD analysis to clinical outcome after allogeneic BMT found that children with clonal IgH rearrangements in diagnostic marrow aspirates who were negative for IgH-PCR at the time of transplant had excellent outcomes. Three of the five children who achieved a relapse during follow-up had IgH rearrangements detected by Southern blot analysis in diagnostic marrow aspirates; their IgH-PCR results were negative. Two of these three had undergone allogeneic BMT, and the other had received chemotherapy alone. The frequency of clonal IgH rearrangements in diagnostic marrow samples correlated with the frequency of disease recurrence in this series. High-level disease-associated MRD in BM specimens collected during the first three 3e33713323
