Novel quantitative indicators of cerebral atherosclerosis and periarteritis on high-resolution MRI in asymptomatic patients at high risk. It remains unclear whether the application of novel quantitative indicators using brain magnetic resonance imaging (MRI) to evaluate the atherosclerotic burden in patients with chronic cerebrovascular insufficiency (CCVI) is feasible in clinical practice. Consecutive patients with atherosclerotic risk factors who had received a brain MRI for routine pre-operative evaluation were prospectively enrolled. The mean thickness and signal intensity of the globus pallidus on MRI were evaluated as quantitative indicators. We assessed the prevalence and predictive factors of atherosclerotic burden, cerebral atherosclerotic burden, and periarteritis in this population, including patients with asymptomatic carotid stenosis ≤ 50%, symptomatic carotid stenosis ≤ 50%, and patients with chronic subdural hematoma. All patients underwent carotid endarterectomy or carotid stenting. A total of 171 asymptomatic patients with atherosclerotic risk factors (mean age 67.1 ± 7.2 years, and mean body mass index 24.0 ± 2.8) were included in this study. Of those patients, 31 (17.7%) showed atherosclerosis of the intracranial and/or extracranial arteries, while all had carotid stenosis ≤ 50% by duplex ultrasound; only one of the patients showed a major plaque on MRI.
