Although mortality related to asthma has declined in recent years, the disease still claims the lives of approximately 300,000 people each year. A number of drugs have been approved for the treatment of asthma; however, the use of these agents has been limited because of cost, side effects and lack of familiarity with the disease and its management. Improvements in the treatment of asthma have been achieved through better understanding of the physiology and pharmacology of airway smooth muscle and the bronchial airway. However, these advances in the study of the airway have been made with a limited number of patients and it is likely that some of the clinical and physiological characteristics of asthmatic patients have not been adequately characterized. The natural history of asthma is variable, with some patients having intermittent symptoms and others with debilitating disease. Understanding the variations in the pathophysiology and the severity of disease over time and identifying more appropriate therapeutic targets may improve management of asthma and reduce mortality.Evaluation of electromyographic dysfunction in patients with genetic neuropathies.
