One of the reasons I like the combat in this game is the variety. Players can pick up any weapon or shield and go to town on their opponents in a multitude of ways. This is something I dont think most roguelikes have. Maybe Chasm? Players can jump on them, hit them with their shield, use a shield bash, get in their way, etc. But this is really only the tip of the iceberg. There is so much the designers have added to make combat challenging and fun. For one, players must be able to control certain combinations of actions or characters. For example, if players use a dagger and an axe at the same time, then the axe will be able to do bonus damage. Players will also need to plan ahead because of the many combinations that can happen in combat. For example, if an enemy player uses an arrow, then players can utilize their counter to dodge. Players will also have to consider if it is more beneficial to go first or last. This is just the tip of the iceberg. If you enjoy rogue-like games, then you owe it to yourself to try out this game. It will challenge your mastery of the genre.98/100 Indie Revolution Intermission III is a roguelike developed by Enders Game and published by Indie Fund. It was released in 2011. After 1.6 years, Intermission III has a new update, Intermission III+BETA, which comes to PC and Linux for free and for $20 on PS4 and Xbox One. What's new:

ING THE WORLD! Providing suggestions and attributes, particularly weapon fire types, so players can focus on how to build these. This is to help people understand which direction they are going to build their building the world. Particularly how easy it is or challenging to get to different equipment. Providing suggestions for the skills/jobs that produce equipment. Building onto the Ideas of "the New Player Experience" that were sent to me that were particularly featured in comments and e-mails. Many of the suggestions here about scalabits, or how cheap to make, though this is not obvious to the new player - but will allow people to get a handle on the cost of doing things. Moving on to weapons builds in the different classes, this will help people get a feel for each classes weapon set so they can quickly evaluate whether a weapon would be useful for them and their build style. Moving on to abilities, this will help people get a feel for how to adjust their classes build to the abilities that will be available to them during their progression. This is a complete list of attributes, but I will further evaluate it and update it with suggestions provided. Impressive visual feedback on the benefit of an attribute. Great visual feedback on the benefit of cool effects. Like comparing applying different bows to the same target, or comparing the range of a bow to a staff. Sometimes in the visual feedback there is a preference of where to put it. Is it -perhaps- to make them easier to compare like objects, or - perhaps- then give them a clear age/age division so they don't get mixed up? I haven't thought about this, but it could give some focus for teachers going over this. And for the developers, this could be something that they could use to save on development costs - doing a style guide of every decision they have made. :guitar: I'm excited to use these for educational purposes to clarify things that are new for me. And with the class guides to make it easier to make some of those comparisons. I'll edit the animations as I work and play to make sure nothing is getting lost in translation. As you may have seen, I have been talking about ways of selling steels to people. This is a big topic, and I wanted to give people time
