Comparison of Stored Buffer-Stabilized Red Blood Cells Using a Liquid and a Vacuum Packaging Strategy. One of the main drivers for the growth in the demand for red blood cells (RBCs) over the past decade has been the increasing prevalence of medical conditions linked to inflammation, including malaria and hereditary coagulation factor deficiency. This has resulted in an increased demand for RBCs and fresh frozen plasma (FFP) transfusion products. The influx of these treatments has resulted in the current inventory of blood products in United Kingdom National Health Service hospitals to be nearly exhausted, and a surplus of both RBCs and plasma has been created. Here we report a comparison of the use of stored RBCs prepared in the traditional storage method for blood banking of 10% glycerol solution using a liquid strategy (4°C) and stored on blood bags using either the traditional 7.2% solution or a vacuum solution (5°C). The results show that samples maintained for 30 days still retain coagulation activity. Also, a shelf-life study shows that samples stored on blood bags can be stored up to 52 days. This work demonstrates that large-scale storage of RBCs by using reutilized plasma would be a viable strategy. The present invention relates to a porous glass-ceramic substrate having pores and a process of forming the porous glass-ceramic
