In the framework, a Vertex object (basically a wrapper class around a vertex) is provided that has a static vector. Basically, a class can add itself to the vector of Vertices and the framework will automatically add it to the visualisation. Is it considered bad practice to return a pointer to a static vector from a class? In the past, I've worked with Java and I was quite confused about returning static members and having them inaccessible from the outside. A: Is it considered bad practice to return a pointer to a static vector from a class? A static member-variable of a class is like a global variable. So it is perfectly good practice to return a pointer to a static vector from a class. But you might want to think about the lifetime of the returned pointer. If the pointer is meant to be returned to user code, then use the normal returning-by-value convention. But if it is meant to be used inside the class, then an alternative would be to make the static member-variable a reference to a vector, and return a reference to it: class A { static vector& v; static vector v_; public: static vector& get_v() { return v; } static vector& get_v() { return v; } }; The problem with this is, vector::operator[] has these definitions: const_reference operator[](size_type pos) const; const_reference operator[](size_type pos) const; Either you want to make get_v() const, and return

So, for example, let's say you find out that The Princess Bride has a female version of the character, Raven Greer (known for her many voices in things like Burger King commercial voiceovers). So, all three of you should voice this character. But, where would you put each of the three characters? Well, the exact character should be played by the exact actor that voices the character. We would have to be Marty St. Clair, Kevin Dean, and the third one, which is the first one played by the actor with the most experience in voice acting. (no, the only movies/shows with this concept I can think of is Terry Turner being "the voice of Scrooge for sure", the start of the movie (where he says "My name is McDuck"...or something like that), but that's about it - most of my other ideas include Drax and the Croods) Sounds like a solid plan, thanks for the reply! And yeah, I have been thinking about what other possibilities are out there. I am not a huge King fan, but I need someone to do a much better and more original (kinky) voice than the rather boring Freddie 08-11-2011, 09:32 AM chiliandbeef Re: Movies in progress in 2011: Actors and their characters Quote: Originally Posted
