Build your own space ship with KOSMOS: This game supports LAN and internet matches, but only one match can be played simultaneously. Quantum-Heated 4x4s: Early Science Fiction How far can we push engineering? In our Quantum-Heated 4x4s series we look at all the stages of developing a concept into a real working vehicle. To us, this is not just a 1,000-foot truck. It's a rugged, multi-purpose vehicle that can conquer the worst terrain or even some unpaved roads. This is a vehicle that can take you almost anyplace, in any weather, every day. A real work vehicle. A true life-saver. This is a mobile lab. But instead of being used to detect atomic secrets, or the Ebola virus, this vehicle can help disaster victims as soon as the storm clouds take form. These are the kinds of vehicles that every land-based company should be producing. Your Mission, if you choose to accept it, is to go as fast as possible on the unforgiving road, helping as many people as possible and showing them that their nearest and dearest can take care of each other. You are recruited for this mission. You will receive a call for a test drive. You accept the mission and get your vehicle ready for the trip to the nearest disaster zone. You are planning your route in such a way that you might just be able to evacuate the most number of people from the earthquake. "This is a brand new vehicle that has hardly set a foot on the road. We are making changes to make sure that it can run on any road, anywhere, at any time. The version we are shipping will have to be practical too, and the 4X4 will come as a standard. That's why we decided to make the first version of this vehicle a truck, so you can drive it anywhere, not just over dirt roads." But will it be of any use in the field? Just watch the test videos to find out. Quantum Computing News #4 Quantum Computing is moving very fast now and the number of applications is growing. In this weeks' news of news we have a video of

What's new:

Maureen Fiedler and Nic Howard brought the best novella-length Hollywood novels out of the aughts with their debut novel Beauty, Beast, a melancholic, dystopian fairy tale. The year 2005 had already produced the novella-length triumph of a Brett Easton Ellis-penned movie, American Psycho, and the novella The Librarians, which features a librarian as an object of desire, setting up a witty, dark take on the kind of swoon-worthy Young Adult heroines of yesteryear. In a time when the industry has long forgotten that piecemeal micro-narrative can be just as effective as giant-budget, 3-D spectacle (and as ironic as fanboy-panned sequel after sequel), Fiedler and Howard continue to explore auteurist careers by crafting worlds of deep, intimate subtext in the form of novella-length genre storytelling. And that is, simply, incredible. In Maureen Fiedler's 2013 novels Skelter, an experiment in micro-narrative, with additional examination of female selfhood, the Librarians are transported from present to the past and begin fighting a war for truth. The Librarians contains twins, one of whom becomes masterfully self-conscious as she begins to seek her autonomy; one of whom, with great heart-tuggingness, attempts to live up to the narrative set in motion by the two above. In The Morbid Curiosity, a modern take on the Rider Haggard monster saga, the popular bookshop proprietress of The Morbid Curiosity becomes obsessed with a specific book. In The People Who Walk Away From Omelas, Fiedler presents the ultimate dystopia: The line between the utopian and the totalitarian is blurred, in a book so perfect-on-its-own that it can function solely as the backdrop for a film starring Kirsten Dunst. In her new novel Skelter, the auteurist Fiedler casts a satirical eye on the celebrity-plagued currently playing Tony Award winner Lillian Hellman's 1969 political-novella-turned-play The Children's Hour, starring Angela Lansbury as the colonized Eloise (a protestor) and Mary Tyrone (a white plantation owner), set in 1962 America. Using as her tool a Mr. Smith invents a female monster called the Skelter, Fiedler creates a
