Customers who used credit and debit cards at a dozen Target stores in Minnesota and Wisconsin since July 8 were the target of a data breach that may affect hundreds of millions of cardholders, a Target spokeswoman said Friday. The data breach began in mid-August when an off-site vendor began processing credit and debit card payments from the retailer's point-of-sale system at the company's Minneapolis stores. The breach occurred while the computers were being updated, according to the spokeswoman. The card-processing system was shut down that day and all affected customers have been notified by mail. Target stores will keep their credit and debit cards shut until they can be converted to EMV-compliant cards, which have an added security feature. In addition to the group of customers whose cards are part of the breach, hundreds of thousands of cards will be affected because of the ongoing breach, the spokeswoman said. "Any time that we're concerned that there's a potential for fraud or we identify that there's a problem, we take immediate action to address it," Target spokeswoman Molly Snyder said. She added that Target has not received any fraudulent charges on customers' cards, and has been unable to determine how much of the breach money may have been stolen. Target said the investigation into the breach is still under way. It's not known how much data from customers' credit and debit cards have been stolen, but Snyder did say that investigators believe there is no malicious software involved. About 40 million cards were affected
