Convert prices into work hours, and find out whether that item is really a good deal. Version: 1.1.8
Size: 1.2 MB Platform: Chrome Web Store TIDAL is the biggest streaming company in the world, with an expected annual revenue of about $3.7 billion in 2014. And that's why we think their marketing of their recently launched service really is starting to sound like a gimmick. While the service sounds great in theory, simply showing people more music can in fact degrade the experience for users. According to TIDAL's website, they promise to "revolutionize the way people listen to music," and that "every click through to a new album or song gives you access to exclusive, curated content."

And when it comes to apps, they're not only open about their reliance on third-party apps, but they're also having fun with it. TIDAL's app, which was released to the App Store just last week, features games and stickers, such as the karaoke effect on the app's welcome screen. But not only that, the app also includes one of the best social functions of any streaming service: a playlist that can be created by friends, family, or fans. Which lead us to ask: does TIDAL have any sort of respect for its audience? The First Platform For Shared Playlists On top of providing access to streaming services for iOS and Android, the TIDAL app allows you to join friend playlists, which are powered by TIDAL's own music library. By joining your friend's playlists, you'll see the top songs from your friend's favorite artists, along with exclusive content and TIDAL's own playlists curated by music experts. Being able to access playlists that are based on what your friends are listening to means that you can discover new artists you may have never heard of before. The fact that TIDAL's playlists are shared with people who may not be your friends also allows you to discover content that you may never have discovered, even when you're listening to music on your own. TIDAL's playlists feature exclusive content Other features of TIDAL's app include: A search function for albums and songs Access

The research, published in the journal Science, presents the first Earth-like planet ever discovered around a star other than our sun. According to the team, the planet has a mass about three times that of the Earth, located just 65 light-years away from Earth, and orbiting the nearby star known as Kepler-32. The discovery of the exoplanet comes at a time when there is great interest in the search for Earth-like planets in the solar system. Scientists are already on the verge of discovering that the search for Earth-like planets has almost come to an end, thanks to new tools that, combined with large detectors, have enabled researchers to detect smaller planets. But there's one more solar system that researchers would like to explore, and that is our own solar system. This is probably the most important goal for astronomy, because scientists believe that exoplanets are natural laboratories to study exoplanets and their atmospheres, because our own solar system is the only system in which this is possible. In this case, the team was able to use spectroscopy to determine the chemical composition of the planet and study its atmosphere, thanks to the presence of atomic
