The model is found to be in agreement with experimental data for the VEGF2 and VEGF3 cobuilds. Furthermore, it was found that the equilibrium between dimerization and the ligand-receptor complex depends on a forward rate constant from the high-affinity form to the ligand-receptor complex and a backward rate constant from the ligand-receptor complex to the equilibrium dimer state. The latter rate constant depends on the concentration of the monomeric form of the receptor. This suggests that the formation of the dimer is governed by a monomeric "off" and a dimeric "on" species of the receptor. Reaction kinetics with respect to the growth factor VEGF can be monitored in a semi-automated single cell microfluidic assay by flow cytometry or confocal microscopy and reveal a sigmoidal curve which has been used to fit models of ligand-receptor interactions.Levels of hemoglobin and plasma volume within the fetal rabbit allantoic membrane. The allantoic cavity and chorioallantoic membrane of the rabbit develop blood vessels and can be used to study blood flow, blood flow regulation, and cardiovascular physiology. The allantoic membrane is the largest of the three sources of blood within the fetal rabbit, and it is a good site to evaluate the regulation of blood flow within the smaller capillaries of the villous tree. Two experiments were conducted to evaluate the levels of hemoglobin (Hb) and plasma volume within this membrane. A chemical precipitate of pigmented erythrocytes was used to estimate Hb concentrations within the allantoic membrane of fetuses at 113 days gestation.
