Lauren Amato, Jesse James. Photo: Getty Images James Franco arrived in an R-rated stage and movie career in the early naughts, delivering a critical hit with The Long Kiss Goodnight. In recent years he's introduced a wider audience to his softer, more objectifying tendencies with Milk and two tv projects, Campion and House of Lies. A Franco performance is a classic mingling of history, self-parody, gas-lamp revues, and prickly banter and offhandedly strict homoeroticism. Franco gives so little away on that shit he doesn't have to. With the always-reliable co-star Jesse James, he centers on a most naked sexual moment from his life that proves both of them - and perhaps the audience - are too silly to throw stones. James Franco as Patrick Melville and Jesse James as Navy officer A.J. Coralin in the 2002 gay-rights legal thriller Stonewall Uprising Photo: Lionsgate The two stumble into a confrontation at a goth club in San Francisco in the early 1970s. The movie is bizarrely artful (and aesthetically stunning in the Almodóvar manner) without having to acknowledge its own strange conceit. The two actors have a wry, mock-serious exchange that leads to an incredibly frank discussion about Patti Smith's Nancy Spungen poetry (notably, an exchange I've never seen take place on the page) and Franco's own "Foley East" tattoos. A character in Franco's stage-TV-film career spends $3,000 on a tattoo of that name, the name of the "Foley East" subway where the act of kissing is banned. James' character is trying to figure out if it's this act of avoiding the human touch that sparked the massive protests at
