Where does the data come from? Lars Bom-Hansen, Lead Football Development Engineer: We captured video, data and processed it in a huge data farm running on a graphic processing unit (GPU). Those elements would then be processed and analysed in a process that we developed over months of work. Actions sampled Steve Nicol, Head of Matchday Analysis: The players wear a chest unit that is a sensor for the player and a collar that talks to the player, as well as one of these motion capture suits with knee, ankle and hip sensors which allow us to collect data. There is another chest sensor, which, if a player goes to get a ball, puts a drop in that would be picked up by the device on the player. So the chest sensor is a device that would trigger the contact of the ball with the player. Every time that the ball hits the player's body, there is a bounce off that would result in the tracking of that ball. And from there, we have all the contact data, the sideways, the leap, the spin, the rotation, the shot, the cross and the header. From a data point of view we have all that contact and go through a process where we match the data from players' previous games, trying to do a fair match. And we make the judgment of whether the player broke the contact in a deliberate action or not, which is what we want. Will we ever see footage of the data collection process? Bom-Hansen: To ensure that we get the best possible data we've recorded and analysed full matches of players in a motion capture suit. Will we ever see what the on-screen match looks like? Steve Nicol: We've been able to visualise the data with a number of players for some years now, but not with some of the game tools. It will happen. FIFA 20 Ultimate Team After a great launch, will there be anything new for Ultimate Team in Fifa 22 Product Key? Nicol: Well, we're doing a lot of work on the game so we'll have all sorts of improvements. We've got a really good understanding of what people want, so the feedback on the product has been great. We'll certainly have a lot of new things in Fifa 22 Free Download. What about consumables? Nicol: Yes, the FA Cup
