The present invention relates to a layer of a tubular knitted fabric which contains at least 30 to 50% of a filiform fiber and has elastic properties. The fabric contains at least a first yarn and a second yarn and is prepared by means of a weaving or knitting process. Various types of tubular knitted fabrics which are elastic and are available in a variety of different colors are known. In most cases, the material contains a plurality of parallel threads which are knitted into a lattice work construction and are intertwined to form rows and columns so that they form a tubular fabric. In accordance with the operating temperature of the fabric, different heat treatments are applied to the fabric before or after the weaving or knitting process. The heat treatment effects either a partial or a complete shrinkage in the longitudinal and/or transverse direction. Such fabrics are manufactured either by completely shrinking the yarns and/or fibers or by subsequently treating the fabric with heat so as to achieve a shrinkage which is greater than the shrinkage experienced during the subsequent heat treatment. Since knitted fabrics are primarily used as underwear, such as women's or children's knitted underwear, they are generally manufactured in white or light-colored colors to be worn underneath other items of clothing, such as a shirt, trousers, skirts, etc. The term underwear includes under-pants, briefs and associated accessories such as suspenders, etc. However

1. Technical Field of the Invention The present invention relates generally to a continuous analyte monitor and recorder system, which can be used in association with various medical devices, and more particularly to an analyte monitor and recorder system with improved means for determining the presence of analyte in the blood and the indication of that presence. 2. Description of the Related Art There are a number of medical procedures in which it is desirable to determine the presence or absence of an analyte in blood or other bodily fluids. Most commonly, the monitored analytes are glucose and lactate (a diagnostic marker for hypoglycemia). These determinations are important in the treatment of diabetes and in situations where the patient is at risk of hypoglycemia (low blood glucose). In such procedures, a test strip for the analyte (usually glucose) is provided that has an electrode for contacting fluid such as blood on one side and a reference or counter electrode on the other side. When a sufficient voltage is applied across the electrodes in the test strip, a potential is developed at the electrodes that is proportional to the concentration of the analyte (for example, glucose) in the blood. This potential is then quantified in conventional fashion, e.g. by a conventional electronic meter, and the results displayed. A trend in the development of test strips has been to miniaturize the device to keep the device as small as possible for easier and more convenient use by the patient. One example of this development is described in U.S. Pat. No. 5,096,669 (Irvin) in which a test device is provided that has only a small reagent holding area (as compared to conventional test devices) in order to leave as much of the test strip as possible for electrical contact with the sample fluid. One method of providing electrical contact between the sample fluid and electrodes on the test strip is to provide two narrow strips of conductive material (one or both of which may be coated with a thin layer of analyte binding agent and labeled with a reference or counter electrode) that are side-by-side with the test strip itself. As another example, the test strip may have a narrow stripe (as compared to the wide reagent area of a conventional test strip) of analyte binding agent (or reagent or indicator compound) and the two electrodes may be deposited on the same side of the strip (as compared to having a reference electrode on one side of the strip and a counter electrode on another side of the strip as
