All she had to do was have a general idea of what he was talking about. He had a nice. He also says that his son worked for five years on this book. Trueman's-. WASHINGTON — For decades, retired Air Force Capt. William C. McCraven has been the family hero. He rose from serving as a fighter pilot in the Vietnam War to becoming one of the first five American astronauts to fly in space. He was commander of the International Space Station during the shuttle program's last years. He flew for the NASA Ames Research Center, which conducts research about space exploration, for more than two decades and, for a short time, was its chief scientist. Now, he is retiring, and the Department of Defense wants him back. Mr. McCraven was tapped by the Pentagon as the Air Force's chief scientist in December, replacing Clarence D. "Kelly" Johnson Jr., who in 2001 rose to become NASA's administrator. He would take the job later the same month. In a speech in July announcing his retirement, Mr. McCraven revealed that, in the wake of the 2003 space shuttle Columbia disaster, he had begun
