Uber claims that on the afternoon of Wednesday, November 23, the driver of the Volvo XC90 pulled over his car in The Netherlands on a whim and discovered that the vehicle was 'pending'. Yesterday, Uber informed the Transport Ministry that the four-wheel drive vehicle with its four independent driving wheels was in fact doing autonomous driving at the time of the incident, which happened at the busy A10 ring-road of The Netherlands. Although Amsterdam is a capital city, the rest of the country in fact has many large towns and cities, which can all be accessed by road. So why, one might ask, are the Dutch authorities not yet aware of this? Of course, in spite of this, in the eyes of the company, Uber's autonomous vehicle was 'pending' - The Dutch Transport Ministry must have confirmed this. It all began when the driver of the self-driving Volvo XC90 stopped at a traffic light, pulled over on his own and noticed that the vehicle was 'pending'. It's not yet clear if the car was 'autonomous' in the way that a car has to carry out all three pillars of the United States' new regulations - 'autonomous', 'automated' and 'driven'. Uber's testing self-driving cars are now on the streets of

Amsterdam It's worth mentioning that the Transport Ministry has had four months to obtain a 1cdb36666d
