GameSpot Game of the Day - November 25, 2017 In the Grange Solitaire, players construct horizontal paths of cards by moving horizontally over the vertical paths of cards. During the course of the game, the player can choose to play a card up, or a card down, which affects how many cards are added to the pile and how many cards are removed from the pile. ...Q: What is the language construct with lambda syntax that allows me to supply arbitrarily many arguments? In C++'s lambda syntax, I can call a function that takes arguments to be invoked with by giving it at one argument using a placeholder like such: auto someFunction = & { /* function body */ } This works for well-defined lambdas with at most one argument, but what if I want to call functions that take any ber of arguments? Is there a way to do this? edit for clarification: Essentially, what I'm trying to do is this: static void foo(int, int) {... } someFunction(42); I'm looking for a way to construct someFunction so that I have the caller call it by passing in 42, or whatever arguments I want. (In particular, I'm trying to avoid manually defining multiple "static" overloads of foo() for different num. arguments.) A: You can't do this. lambda expressions that use the placeholder syntax are really syntactic sugar; they are designed to treat a lambda function as a functor that's passed by value, and use its operator() to call the actual function object. lambda means the arguments provided by your code are passed as free parameters, which are always packed into a single vector (in this case, a std::vector). For user-defined function types, you could write a perfect lambda for functions that have that type -- in particular, you'd want to implement a so-called enable_if_t parameter pack. But it's not immediately obvious that you'd ever want to write a helper like this. For example, lambda expressions are sometimes used to emulate function objects in template programming, which gets messy fairly quickly if you need to support a lot of specialization. C++14's proposal for generalized lambda expressions might make this easier, since it could allow writing such a perfect forwarder itself. You'd just provide an "executable" that is (statically or dynamically) evaluated at the place where the lambda is actually called and passed the arguments for that function. At the moment, though, this is

Recently acquired this game on Steam, and with little or no previous experience with it I've been able to test the game out and play it for nearly six hours now. Below is a list of my experiences from this game and, I have a few thoughts. Graphics/visuals: This game is pretty great. It's clean and nice to look at. Everything has a nice smoothness to it, and the way the lighting, dirt, and grass all interact is very realistic. The game is obviously a 2D game, but
