I am using the mip-server to interface my VHDL code to Haskell. The problem is that I am unable to install the mip-server on Windows because it depends on a bunch of the X libraries that I don't have on Windows. How can I install the mip-server in Windows environment? A: You can use haskell-mingw to build the mingw package so that you don't need to install X. Re-Uploaded: Oct 26, 2017 -.A selection of malware and cybercrime incidences throughout 2016 The past year saw a number of high profile cyber-attacks against institutions and individual citizens alike. While the day-to-day headlines often centre on the latest 'WannaCry' ransomware outbreak, we should not forget about the crooks responsible for such incidents, the sheer number of attacks waged by groups of hackers and the potential impact they could have on the wider security community. Here are a few articles and other sources of cybercrime information to remember in 2016: Listed below are a selection of cybercrime incidents that had a particularly strong presence in the news and social media in the past twelve months. The WannaCry ransomware outbreak was unquestionably one of the big stories of 2016. A ransomware was utilised that quickly spread through the UK's NHS and became the subject of a major national government investigation. On 16 May, the National Health Service - much of which could only be accessed through some computers - was cut off from its systems following an early morning cyberattack. The attack impacted more than 50,000 computers and at one point, GP surgeries were left without access to their own patients' records. Hackers were able to breach security to download a file that encrypted computers and made them unable to work, only allowing access once they had been infected with a key and then paid a ransom. The attack took the NHS system down for a number of days, and the incident was used by the Conservative party to claim that the Labour government "just doesn't care" about the NHS. At the start of 2016, a

WannaCry-like ransomware was actively taken up by cyber-criminals. Known as NotPetya and Atak, the cyber-attack was used to infect targets with a digital weapon that encrypted important data and left victims unable to access their files. NotPetya was able to spread through a number of Ukrainian organisations before being cracked by the NSA. The virus was used by hackers to infect government computers in at least 24 countries. The attack saw several industry businesses infected, including the Kiev-based firm M.E.Doc, which handled a number of Ukraine's largest pension 6d1f23a050
