Kotler, Philip.A recent study in Europe has revealed that there is large variability in the occurrence of diabetes among obese people. This is worrying news as obesity is expected to rapidly increase in the future, and will have a significant impact on public health. Researchers at the Copenhagen University Hospital in Denmark assessed blood sugar levels, measured as blood glycated hemoglobin, in approximately 2,000 obese patients. The study participants ranged in age from 20 to 80 years, and were tracked over a period of one year. Of these patients, approximately 40 percent were either newly diagnosed with type 2 diabetes, or were previously undiagnosed cases of the condition. The study showed that, in this subgroup of patients, the average age of developing the condition was fifty-one years, and over half of the people already had diabetes. Additionally, the investigators found that there were very high rates of obesity among newly diagnosed cases of the condition. In fact, 90 percent of the patients were obese, meaning that they were at high risk of developing diabetes. In contrast, only 5 percent of the subgroup of people who had been diagnosed with diabetes were obese, and a higher percentage of participants had only prediabetes. The investigators suggest that the reason for this trend may have something to do with lifestyle, but it is not yet clear what changes might be needed to lower the risk of diabetes in these patients.
