In the elderly, alterations in cyclosporine pharmacokinetics, as a result of alterations in the metabolism of cyclosporine and alterations in the catabolism of compounds that undergo active metabolism, may require therapeutic changes in dose or dosing interval. Changes in cyclosporine pharmacokinetics that may occur with age include decreases in the bioavailability of cyclosporine, decreases in the apparent volume of distribution, increases in the systemic clearance of cyclosporine, and increases in the peripheral blood distribution volume. Once these changes are corrected for by adjustment of dose, subsequent changes in pharmacokinetics are secondary to age-related changes in tissue distribution of cyclosporine. The observed age-related decreases in bioavailability and apparent volume of distribution occur because of age-related increases in the clearance of cyclosporine, and appear to occur at a much slower rate than age-related changes in the distribution volume.
